The basic premise behind suspension is three-fold: It makes things more comfortable; the shocks absorb bumps so that your body doesn't have to. It helps you keep your bike under control—suspension helps your wheels accurately track the terrain, rather than bouncing and deflecting off of it. It helps the rear wheel stay planted on the ground so that, when you're pedaling, your efforts actually make the bike move forward.

“The bicycle is a simple solution to some of the most complicated world’s problems.”

— Unknown Author

Urban bikes are designed to have reasonably quick, yet solid and predictable handling, and are normally fitted with full fenders for use in all weather conditions. A few city bikes may have enclosed chainguards, while others may be equipped with suspension forks, similar to mountain bikes. City bikes may also come with front and rear lighting systems for use at night or in bad weather.

Bikes are pretty cool vehicles. You might not think of them as vehicles, but just like cars and trucks and planes, they transport people from one place to another. The really cool thing is that they are entirely people-powered. They don't use gasoline or electricity. We make them work by pushing out feet.
